Honey Bee Management—Better Winter and Early Spring Survival

Rocky Kuenen

Honey bees are social insects, who depend upon the colony community for their survival, food, shelter and successful brood production and development. Humans have kept bees for honey, wax, and crop pollination for several hundred years. With proper and timely management of provisional food and forage, parasites such as Varroa mites, small hive beetles and wax moths, and Nosema disease, honey bees do very well in our area.

In this class, a local, professional beekeeper, Mr. Kevin Blair, will share his practical knowledge regarding how and when to prepare bees for winter and early spring, before the almond bloom. Rocky will share her three year journey of beekeeping in a farm backyard.

Practicing the 4 Ds of Pruning

Ron Vivian

Pruning is both an art and a science. The process can be overwhelming, especially if the shrub or tree in question has not been pruned for a good while. It can be difficult to see what to cut to get the desired shape, and once executed, a cut cannot be undone! That's where the four D's come in to simplify things.

Learn from Ron how to prune to increase amount of production on your fruit trees.
