This short workshop aims to provide information on the Forest Service 2010 Hazardous Fuels Woody Biomass Grants program. This national program is intended to help improve forest restoration by using and creating markets for small-diameter material and low-valued trees removed from hazardous fuel reduction and forest health activities. These funds are targeted to help communities, entrepreneurs, and others turn residues from hazardous fuel reduction and forest health projects into marketable forest products and/or energy products. Individual grants can be from $50,000 to a maximum of $350,000. Half of the funds will be targeted towards "high priority national forests" which includes the Shasta-Trinity National Forest.

Topics will include:

- Background
- Application process
- Eligibility
- Obligations
- Timeline
- Examples of successful projects (including locally)
- Assistance available to help with applications
- Questions
